I find that most people have a deep, resonant sense of home that they long to capture within their walls. It's not difficult to make homes rich with memories of places we have loved, or perhaps hope to live in the future. Some people do it with furniture from previous homes, or inherited pieces imbued with family history. Others have little need for that, yet still want a home that speaks of accrued experiences, of where they've been and where they may be going.
